"...She found instead magnificent the stars... and fearfully grandiose and spellbound the steep grandeur of the mountains..."

Treading in D.H. Lawrence's footsteps...

Lord Byron Viaggi presents a literary journey full of fascination and evocative power, in search of the places reached and narrated by D.H. Lawrence at Picinisco, a small typical town located in Ciociaria, not too far from Rome. The house where the famous English writer lived is now known as D.H. Lawrence's House, a typical early 19th Century English building situated on the slope of the Abruzzo National Park. Its name is in honour of the famous writer David Herbert Lawrence, who was Orazio Cervi's guest here, who found the inspiration to complete his famous novel "The Lost Girl" choosing as background of the events narrated in the story the nature and the people of this village. The Pacitti family, present owners of the house, after an accurate restoration has turned the building into a farm holidays. The members of the family are farmers and stock-breeders from generations and produce delicious cheese and meat which enrich their guests' tables.
